ISOLANDA

By Yamadori

Isolanda was a dancer, a voluptuous and utterly pagan dancer, who took San Franciscans by storm some years ago. I attended one of her first performances, "The Dance of Salome." The next day I wrote an outburst of praise in one of the papers, in which I compared her to an Amazon beauty.

Three days later I interviewed her in her suite at the hotel, and that interview is one that cannot be forgotten.

It was on the night before Christmas. The city was comparatively quiet that night, and occasionally I would hear jazz music from an apartment in the distance.

Before me, on the sofa, was Mademoiselle Isolanda, a languorous woman, with darkly sparkling eyes and marvelously pure complexion. A faint odor of incense wafted from somewhere . . .

"You just said that you envy me. Why?" she asked, after some time of pause.

"Because you possess wealth, beauty, popularity—things which all men and women are hungrily striving for and never attain. You nightly entrance people; win their applause—and their money, and you live as a goddess might in blissful luxury. Isn't that enough to cause the envy of an irksome molecule like myself, who pursues happiness by pursuing illusion?"

"No. You are wrong. You're an idealist; I'm a realist. You attain happiness by pursuing illusion; I miss happiness by attaining reality. For, after all, isn't illusion ninety per cent of human happiness?"

"I may be a philosopher when I have to be one," I said. "And if I had to walk the streets with the cold wind piercing my threadbare clothes, I could find solace by looking at blind beggars on the corner. But if you offered me all your sumptuous realities, do you think I would refuse them? Indeed, I would not!"

"Perhaps you will not refuse them," Isolanda said with a bewitching smile, and she slowly

CABINET MEETS TO MAKE PREPARATION FOR NEW GENERAL ELECTION, JUNE

Home Minister Appoints 36 New Governors of Prefectures

Special to the Japanese American News

TOKYO, May 17.—The Imperial cabinet convened today at noon in order to make preparations for the coming pre-fectural election and for the first general election under manhood suffrage, which will probably be held next June.
