Messrs. K. Abiko, publisher; S. Hara, business manager; and H. Shishimoto, managing editor of the Japanese American News acted as hosts.

Tidewater

(By Iwao Kawakami)

The "hataitsu" finished at five o'clock. For Chikagi, it had been one long series of short, mad dashes over neatly trimmed lawns, through the rear entrance and into the kitchen of over fifty houses.

Once or twice, mishaps occurred, such as, smashing of "tofu" and breaking of a "shoyu" bottle. But, for his first day, his average of accidents was remarkably high or low, depending on the viewpoint.

Expecting diarrhea from the unfortunate customers, he received a distinctly surprising shock, when an old lady gave him a cut of a freshly-made pie, and an old man offered him a sample taste of anti-prohibitionary beverage.

"By lord, I'm supposed to be a stranger here, but most of them treat me like a life-long friend," was his somewhat wondering observation.

As he brought the big box with the two delivery baskets inside into the store, Mrs. Harumoto, who was scooping out some "umeboshi" from an encrusted "taru" looked up and asked with a smile that wrought a lovely transformation in her homely face: "Tsukare mashta desho?"

He answered with a laugh: "Iie. Sonnanai tsukaremasen desuyo."

After she weighed the package of "umeboshi" and placed it on the counter, she asked him again: "Hara wa hetchi imasho? Yew-meshi wa uchide dodesu ka?"

He was about to acquiesce, when he remembered that Mr. Okada had invited him to supper. Though he hated to mention it, nevertheless, he was forced to explain. As he turned to go, Mrs. Harumoto stopped him with "Chottoh matteh kudasai. Koreo Okada-sanni motete kudasai."

Both teams hit freely which kept the spectators on their feet, each side using three twirlers apiece. Nakamura led the attack for the home team, getting four hits out of five trips to bat, and knocking in three runs as well as crowding himself in for two extra runs by two sensational head-first dives for the plate. Sako and Tachino also connected with long triples, making the game interesting to the end.
