"DANSHI NO HONKAI," muttered Premier Hamaguchi immediately after he was shot at the Tokyo Central station last Friday. In a recent comment we rejoice over the fact that the spirit of the samurai ancestors still lives and that it is only hidden behind the polished and westernized manners of modern Japan. A reader asks to have the meaning of the words explained. In the absence of anything better we will let the Premier himself explain. The day after the shooting the Premier is reported to have said in a conversation with Issei Ugaki, Army Minister, "I have always tried to serve my country like a man regardless of my own personal danger. In working for the best interests of one's country, there naturally arises antagonism and clash of opinions. I have always expected that something like this would happen. As I have said before, I have the satisfaction of knowing that I have done my duty as a man in a brave and fearless fashion."—No matter what happens, the satisfaction of knowing that one has acted like a man in the service of country and society—that, we feel, is what the dauntless Premier meant by "Dan-shi no honkai."

That was the spirit of a "danshi" of Japan—glorying in the service of country and man regardless of personal danger. And that, too, by the way, seems to be the same thing which the young folk here call, "the spirit of service."

Japan's champion chimney sitter has at last come off his perch after 129 hours aloft. Recently an English paper printed in Japan had in daring headlines "Nutties Americans go sit on tree tops."—In the case of the Japanese chimney sitter, it is a different matter. The little man went up there as a protest against the firing of hundreds of fellow workers in a huge spinning mill. Today he is down and the workers can go back to work. This little man had a reason—Wonder why the American endurance champion goes through their antics.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

By GLENN FRANK

I believe that it is within the power of the captains of American industry to solve, without governmental interference, the problem of unemployment.

I believe that it is to the selfish interest of the captains of American industry to solve the problem of unemployment; that is to say, I think that unemployment strikes as serious a blow at American industry as it does at the American worker who is out of work.

Paul H. Douglas, from whom I quoted yesterday, doubts that the captains of American industry will solve the problem of unemployment by the kind of regularization of production I have been discussing during the last two days, and here are the reasons that underlie his doubt:

(1) He suspects that a large percentage of employers will continue either unable or unwilling to see the imperative necessity of solving the problem of unemployment. He dots his hat to such men as Owen D. Young and Morris Leeds for the superb combination of business intelligence and social imagination they have brought to the problem of regularizing production and employment, but he fears that such men are the exceptional geniuses of the business world as a Michelson or a Millikan are exceptional geniuses in the world of science.

(2) He suspects that the various programs for regularizing production and employment, that have proved so successful in manufacturing plants dealing with standardized or virtually monopolized products, will find harder sledding in manufacturing plants dealing with commodities that are subject to extreme style and weather influences and that are produced under stiffly competitive conditions.

(3) He suspects that the better the management, from the point of view of productive efficiency, the more management will create technological unemployment in its quest of lower and lower production costs.

(4) He suspects that we are doomed to meet this loss is to do what we do in the case of fire, namely, to insure against it.

This raises the next question of unemployment insurance which is destined to come more and more into the field of politics, a question to which I want to give detailed attention sometime in the near future.

(Special to The Japanese American News)

TOKYO, Nov. 21.—(UP)—Drenched but victorious, Kiyoshi Tanabe, who holds the record for chimney sitting for Japan and probably the whole world, today proudly descended from his perch atop a smoke stack near here.

Ironically, Tanabe, who suffered severely from lack of food and water, was told of his victory just as a gentle rain began to fall, offering ease to his parched mouth. Tanabe had been atop 129 hours because of business depression, and only consented to come down when informed that difficulties had been settled and the men would be employed again.
